FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

The True Story of a Brave Little Girl Whom God Needed.

She was only a little girl of thirteen. Her iather was ill, and her mother was kept beside his couch to care for him. Two little brothers with these formed the family. There was a small store in a portion of the town quite distant from the home that had to be kept open, as it formed the only source of support for the family.

To this store every day trudged the little storekeeper through the bitter cold of winter, carrying in her pocket a piece of unbuttered bread for dinner. All day she sold her goods and each night carried her goods and each night carried home to "poor, sick papa" the mon-ey she received. In the cold back room she ate her sorry dinner. Occasionally she saved a penny or two and at Christmas bore to her sick father an orange and to each brother a little toy, but nothing for herself. She passed each day the baker's windows, where were displayed many things that looked good to hungry childish eyes, but not a penny bought anything for herself. She ate her cold bread and saved all the money for papa and the family.

One evening she lost one of her mittens, but told no one of her loss, as it would take money to buy another. In the biting cold she would wear it on one hand until the other was cold and then change it. Thus she supported the family through the winter, paying by her work for food and fuel. This little heroine no longer lives, for God has need of all such. The snows are today piled above her grave, but there are hearts that will never forget the little heroine and her devotion to her family.

This is a true story .- Cor. New York Press.

Dude, the Railroad Dog. Dude was the name of a dog that before his death, which took place recently at St. Louis, Mo., had a very wide circle of acquaintances. The dog lived near the depot and soon became possessed of the idea that he must watch the grade crossings, of which there are a number in the vicinity. For more than two years he had met every inbound train and preceded the locomotive, barking in energetic warning. His plan was to dash down the main line as soon as a train whistled in the lower yards and, turning about, speed ahead of the engine until it stopped at the platform. The railroad companies provided no watchman at the crossing, so that Dude was really useful, and many a pereyes of the Lord if I kept down to son has been warned of the approach of danger by the frantic barks of the dog. Dude's end came in a very sad way. A train several minutes late and making up time proved too speedy for the little pilot, and he was run down and killed. Dude is mourned sincerely by the many railroad men who knew him,

Not a Ladylike Reply. Once when Queen Alexandra was returning from a sail with her daughters, who were then little children, an old sailor instinctively said to one of them, who was walking up the plank, "Take care, little lady." "I'm not a lady," haughtily retorted the child. "I'm a princess!" The queen, who overheard the kindly injunction and the rather ill bred reply, said quickly, "Tell the good sailor you are not a little lady yet, but you hope to be some day."
